

A high resolution scan keeps every detail of the page, but its image is far larger than the limit used when the text of a page is read. The scan of the harbour register was made at six hundred dots per inch.