

Chapter one describes the arrival of the surveyors at the harbour of Wexcombe, where the first measurements were taken on a grey morning.

Chapter two follows the road inland to the village of Pennyfold, where an old mill still grinds barley for the local bakery.

Chapter three ends at the summit of Kettle Hill, from which the whole valley and the winding river can be seen on a clear day.